THE KENYON FUND

Dear Fellow Alumnus:

The '68 - '69 Kenyon Fund is now a matter of record. The results are gratifying, but a great deal of work must still be done in the years ahead to allow this source of unrestricted funds to grow not only in dollar value, but in participating percentages which we should enjoy from a loyal constituency.

The Executive Committee of the Alumni Council, your voice in College affairs, has asked those of us in charge of the Fund to not only explain, but to outline our programs for this year which will insure another successful campaign.

Our goal, as fund raisers, is to produce the maximum number of dollars with the minimum amount of friction. We want our appeals, their style, their frequency, their intensity, to sustain your loyalty and solicit your dollar support without irritation.

The feed back that we receive lets us know that multiple appeals are necessary. For some of our more orderly numbers they can be irritating, but for most of us, continued prodding is needed. We find that one form of reminder, the Phonathon, has a special appeal and we plan to use these again this year, as we have in the past.

As we conduct this campaign, we would like to have you, the giver, send us your comments. We welcome criticism, but not blind criticism. If it means enough to write us, please sign it. Your voices can be heard either directly to us or through your Alumni Representatives in the various local offices. We feel that your criticism will help us in making the Kenyon Fund grow.

Thank you.

The Cost of Reconciliation

by A. DENIS BALLY

The Kingdom of God is besieged, and the violent take it by storm.

(Matt. 11:12)

All this is from God, who through Christ reconciled us to himself, and gave us the ministry of reconciliation; that is, God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself.

(II Cor. 5:18-19)

YOU do not need me to tell you that this world in which we live is a world of trouble and anguish, beset with violence, and with no end of the violence yet in sight. If, as I most sincerely hope we may, we succeed in extricating ourselves from our futile adventures in Vietnam, we shall have solved exactly nothing. The escalation in the Middle East will continue, the ghastly situation in Nigeria will not have been assuaged, Czechoslovakia will not have become a free nation, and the fury which haunts the cities and campuses of this nation will not have been exorcised. These are somber thoughts and the question to which we must unceasingly address ourselves is this: How must those who profess and call themselves Christian conduct themselves in a world given to violence?

I confess that I loathe violence, and I loathe the anger and the hatred which accompanies it. I am convinced that, however much is gained by violent action, more is always lost, for it cannot but be, however righteous the cause, that violence bring suffering in its train, and misery and affliction to the innocent. Yet, for all my loathing, I must admit also that again and again in history violence has erupted because men could see no alternative to violent action. In fact, I would go so far as to say that this is the only reason for explosions of popular violence and revolt. Somewhere in every storm-center of violence there is a sizeable group of people for whom the situation has become intolerable. Therefore, God is present in every such situation confronting the world, and saying, "What are you going to do now?" God is always, at the very least, just as much set over against us, as he is on our side. In every historical crisis he confronts us directly in the very thing that we fear and dread.

If then, God is on the other side, demanding an answer from us, just as much as he is on our side to save us from annihilation, then it follows that neither side can ever be the victor, for neither side can remove the opposition from its path. The only alternative to brutality and war is reconciliation, and God has entrusted to those who worship him the task of reconciliation. If they are not engaged in this task, then their worship is vain.

It has become customary in the past decade or so to speak and write somewhat glibly of reconciliation, as if this were something to be achieved by good will and the exercise of reason. This is indeed to underestimate the weight of glory that has been laid upon us. Reconciliation will cost you your life, and the life of many, many other people as well. It is not to be obtained at any smaller price.

God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself. If anything is made clear in the great corpus of biblical literature, it is that God is not man, and man is not God. That which we call the world, that whole realm of existence to which man belongs, and that which we call God, stand in eternal opposition to each other, because they are necessarily different, and their purposes at variance. "My ways are not your ways," saith the Lord, "neither are my thoughts your thoughts." In Christian understanding the reconciliation of man with the absolutely other, with that ultimate reality which of its very essence is not man, could come to pass only should there be someone who was at one and the same time altogether God, and altogether man. In the kind of crisis which the New Testament envisages the initiative could come only from God, for it was beyond the power of man. The New Testament therefore speaks of how reconciliation was achieved. "The Word became flesh, and dwelt among us." If we are to use theological language, therefore, reconciliation is achieved only by incarnation.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR — A. Denis Baly is Chairman of the Department of Religion at Kenyon. Born and educated in England, Mr. Baly's main field of research is that of biblical geography with a secondary interest in the question of Christian faith and international politics, especially with relation to the Middle East. This article is the text of a sermon delivered by Mr. Baly on Sept. 9, 1969 in the Church of the Holy Spirit at Gambier.

But theological language does little good these days.

In the world in which we live all that is comprised in the phrase "god-talk" has become almost meaningless, and we grope desperately for what Bonhoeffer has called a "non-religious interpretation of Christianity." Yet the fact that we have forgotten what religious words mean, and they have become for us "a book that is sealed," in no way alters the truth of what they once expressed. The reality they affirmed is not lessened because there are no longer words to set it forth. If once it were true that the method of reconciliation is that someone would take upon himself that nature to which he is utterly opposed, it cannot cease to be true now that mankind has come of age. Whatever may have happened to our ideas of God in this efficient, technological age, the nature of the reality with which we have to contend has in no way been changed. It is the same, yesterday, today, and forever.

Nor is the character of reconciliation in any way altered by the fact that we have in our present world new sets of opposites. It is becoming increasingly irrelevant in this nation to speak in terms of Protestant, Catholic, and Jew, though it was not so very long ago that these were words charged with power. It is even becoming irrelevant to speak of north and south. Increasingly now men identify themselves as Black or White, as Young or Old. It is these, apparently so diametrically opposed today, that must be reconciled with each other. This can never be done by the exercise of sweet reason, for when new polarities of this kind develop, it is of the very essence of the opposition that each side sees the other as altogether unreasonable. It is to them illogical that the other side should think, and act, and exercise power, in the way that it does, and they find themselves saying that it would be almost better if the other side were eliminated, or at least reduced to impotence. But we have seen that reconciliation is never achieved by victory and conquest, except only in the sense that the acid pen of Tacitus has so aptly described: Solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant (They create a wilderness, and they call that 'peace.').

Reconciliation requires that men and women clothe themselves with the nature of those to whom they are so bitterly opposed, that they read their books, think their thoughts, and identify themselves with that other world, and yet never at the cost of ceasing to belong to their own world. It is a very strong temptation to go over altogether to the other side, and to imagine that in so doing one has acted as a Christian.

This is not true, and indeed it is a dangerous and a corrupt act. When we do this, we imagine that we have purged ourselves of our ancient hatreds, and clothed ourselves with righteousness, but we have done no more than take upon ourselves new enemies, and new hatreds. If you do not believe this, observe only how words of hate and anger, such as "racist," become part of the vocabulary of those who have made this leap.

What is necessary, and what is far more difficult, is to belong with heart and mind to both sides, and to bind them together into one in your own person. This is what will cost you your life. At the very least your whole life will have to be spent in this, for it cannot be achieved in a day; and it is not impossible that it will cost you your livelihood, or indeed cost you your life literally. I cannot now foretell what will happen in the struggles in which we are presently engaged, but if they become yet more angry, both sides are bound to call you "traitor," for neither side will tolerate someone who is not 100% for them.

It is perhaps a little easier for those who belong to the establishment, those who are white, and those who are older, to perceive the necessity of this kind of self-giving, for if they think at all they must be uneasily aware of how little the other side has been taken into consideration until now. It is surely more difficult for those who have given themselves to reform to see any necessity at all for identifying themselves with those who oppose reform. They are bound to be impatient, for they think with good reason that patience has brought about no changes. They want reform because they are shocked, and rightly shocked "for the comfortless troubles' sake of the needy, and the deep sighing of the poor." Ecclesia semper est reformanda (the Church is always in need of reform), and not only a church, but a college, and a nation, indeed any society at all requires constantly to be cleansed. Those who strive for reform have the right of the matter, but for this very reason they have little sympathy with those who desire no reform, and they have no wish to be tainted with what they believe to be their callousness and sloth.

Here is the rub. We mean well, I suppose, most of us. We wish to do what is right, and we are first moved to take the other side seriously, and perhaps even to join them, as we become persuaded that there is more justice in their claims than we had before imagined. We join this side or that side ultimately because we have convinced ourselves that the good that they intend outweighs the evil that they do. We discount this evil because of the rightness of the purpose, but we give full weight to the evils of the other side because we cannot convince ourselves that their purposes are good. But what I have called "incarnation" means a total identification with both sides, certainly the clear recognition of what is good, and the embracing of that, but no less certainly the taking upon oneself of the heavy load of guilt which each side always carries, the wicked anger that they feel, the cruel words they use, the brutalities they commit. I do not say that we should do these things. God forbid! I say only that to bear the burden of them is the fate of any who would attempt the task of reconciliation. But it is written, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

Alumni Reunions Moved to Weekend Following Commencement

This year, by action of the Executive Committee of the Alumni Council, alumni reunions will be held following Commencement, during the weekend of June 5, 6 and 7.

Allen Martin, Director of Development, is working with a committee made up of Calvin S. Frost, Jr., '63, Chairman; Carl C. Cooke, Jr., '47; Bill B. Ranney, '52; Herbert J. Ullmann, '52; Charles R. Leech, Jr., '52; and Randolph D. Bucey, '50, ex officio, all of whom met for preliminary planning last Fall. Details on the weekend will be sent to alumni in February, and class agents will start contacting their classmates shortly thereafter.

In changing the date of its alumni reunions, Kenyon is following the successful examples of a number of other men's colleges. Experience with the arrangement shows that reunions are far better attended, are able to offer more events of value, and that the problems of lodging, feeding, etc., are immensely simplified.

Classes on either side of a reunion class are cordially invited to return and meet with men they knew at Kenyon. In following this arrangement, the reunion class of 1940, for example, will be joined by the classes of 1939 and 1941, and inasmuch as there will be ample facilities for housing and feeding, returning alumni are urged to bring their wives and families.

Reunion classes and their agents are:

Class	Agent
1920	Maj. Gen. Frank A. Allen, Jr.
1925	Theodore C. Diller
1930	R. Wells Simmons
1935	James R. Alexander
1940	Lawrence G. Bell
1945	Robert W. Ballantine
1950	Louis S. Whitaker
1955	James A. Hughes, Jr.
1960	The Rev. Richard S. Kerr
1965	William S. Hamilton

Coordinate College Open House Draws Throngs

As many as four generations of the same family gathered on Sunday, October 5, at the Kenyon Coordinate College for Women for an open house at a new dormitory and the commons buildings.

A total of about 1,500 people toured the two buildings during the day, as the women students acted as guides and sources of information. Here and there a student was caught with her feet propped on a table studying a literature lesson or working math problems, but generally it was a time of relaxation from busy schedules and a time to express genuine pride in their new school.

The dormitory is one of two such structures to be built on the grounds. Each dorm will eventually house about 160 women. The building is a long arch, and the women's rooms are on each end of the building with lounges and study rooms in the center of each floor.

The commons building is a combination dining hall and meeting room for the members of the Coordinate College. On the main floor are lounges, study rooms, and a snack area. The lower level is the dining area capable of serving 300 students at a time.

Busses shuttled visitors to and from the parking lot, as undergraduates acted as guides.

Fellow Alumnus:

I was there and it was beautiful!

Kenyon's first Alumni Day (formerly Homecoming) on October 11th afforded those in attendance the opportunity to enjoy the beautiful multi-colored Gambier foliage; a new women's dormitory and dining complex that leaves absolutely nothing to be desired; and a winning football game in which the Lords scored more points than had any Kenyon team in sixty years (Kenyon 56 - Lake Forest 8). It was beautiful!

Kenyon and the Gambier community are not impervious to the world-wide changes, and a visit to Gambier is heartily recommended. You will not be sorry.

You should all be aware of the change in the Alumni Office. Although we are without a full-time Alumni Secretary as such, Allen Martin, Director of Development, has assumed the responsibility for the expedient execution of the duties of that office.

The Executive Committee of the Alumni Council and the College administration have decided that logistical difficulties during Commencement weekend no longer make it feasible to accommodate the graduates, their families, related personnel, and the alumni simultaneously. Consequently, (in June, 1970) we have scheduled, and are working on, the first of what will be called Reunion Weekend, to be held annually the weekend following Commencement. The entire weekend and the whole campus will be devoted to alumni, wives and families. It is our hope and expectation that we will develop a program appealing to all, and one you will not want to miss. Full details will be provided later, but make plans NOW to bring your family to Kenyon on June 5th. Children are very definitely welcomed.

This year can be an exciting one if you make an effort to join us and participate. Although our numbers are small, our enthusiasm is limitless. Kenyon will not be denied.

Randolph D. Bucey

President, The Kenyon Alumni Association

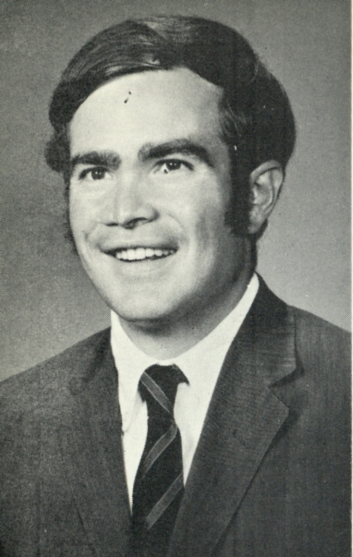

Members of the undefeated 1950 team returned.

He was there . . . and it was beautiful!

The weather was great and the mood gay on Alumni Day, October 11. Over 200 alumni returned, helping to make up the largest crowd ever to watch a Kenyon football game . . . and what they saw was an exciting Lord eleven rolling over Lake Forest 56 to 8. The tent was pitched on the lawn beside the Alumni House — convenient, easily accessible, and as a result, filled with alumni and wives far into the night. Accordion music floated on the air, and the beer flowed like free beer, which it was. Make you feel like coming back next October?

A Survey of American Prejudice 101

by WILLIAM K. WOODS

Currently academic and popular publications compete for articles about the black history movement. Telecasts inform citizens of each campaign launched by students to establish courses in black history at their high schools or colleges. Most schools, however, race to inaugurate studies in Afro-American culture before student pressures for curriculum innovations ever build up. Journalists write popular series on black history, while pragmatic social science graduate students adjust their programs in order to benefit from a scramble among universities to endow a plethora of new professorships in black studies.

All of this activity indicates that black men, after suffering decades of discrimination and neglect, now demand their rightful place in the history books as well as in the social, economic and political action of modern life. Hopefully, courses in black culture will help to destroy those simplistic and stereotyped ideas about the Negro that so many whites continue to cherish like biblical absolutes. An ably taught survey of Afro-American history could provide black students with some perspective about their present situation.

There remain, nevertheless, certain criticisms of the black history movement that deserve consideration. Whenever a legitimate field of study becomes wildly popular due to a peculiar set of circumstances in contemporary society, that study faces a risk of deteriorating into a fad. A subject's enduring value may be sacrificed to satisfy an era's whims. Professor John Hope Franklin, a scholar of Negro history, warns that Afro-American studies confront this danger of overnight success.¹ Enthusiastic converts to this movement may tend to view this study as a completely new phenomenon.

Whitney Young, Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, levels another criticism at this rush to institutionalize black studies.² His arguments particularly pertain to white scholars working in this field. Young finds it ironic that at a time when money becomes scarce for social and economic programs to ameliorate conditions in urban ghettos, universities and foundations underwrite a plethora of grants for academicians who wish to study any minute facet of Negro life. While funds for certain poverty program's dry up, a white man could conceivably receive a grant to make a survey of Negro barbers during the 1870's.

Young's criticism extends beyond his condemnation of white bureaucrats who capitalize on the plight of the ghetto. He says that even the best recent analyses of black communities tend to be duplications of earlier studies, while most of these works represent scholarship for scholarship's sake. Each generation produces a bevy of well researched reports that document in depth the social, economic and political condition of the American Negro. These studies usually arouse public interest for a few days, but they soon become relics in library basements, while the problems that they describe evolve toward more critical stages of development. A classic example of such a report was a study on all aspects of Negro life in Detroit that was completed by a blue ribbon commission during the 1920's.³ A committee of local leaders that included theologian Reinhold Niebuhr, submitted a volume as large as a big city telephone book that catalogued the inadequate employment, housing, educational and recreational opportunities available to Detroit's black population in 1925.

Mr. Young advocates an end to all these studies of black people conducted by white technicians. Instead of more analyses of black institutions, scholars should focus their attention on factors within the white community. After all, chides Young, Negro problems stem from an imposed set of relationships established by the white populations of America. Dissect "Whitey's" prejudices and you will discover those diseases that cripple race relations in the United States. Young conjectures that two goals would be accomplished if black men were hired to study white racism. Unemployed blacks would possess jobs while relevant insights about American society would emerge from these research projects.

This proposal that studies of white America's prejudices should receive priority over new research on Negro problems deserves attention. Certainly competent students of Negro life concern themselves with the interrelationships between whites and blacks, but Mr. Young makes a valid point when he talks about a myopic preoccupation with clinical dissections of black Americans. Since white Protestant immigrants and their descendants established the rules that governed social patterns in North America, it becomes a prerequisite to understand the WASP culture, before one can comprehend any minority group's existence within it. If one wishes to gain perspective about prejudice in the United States, it seems sensible to work toward an evaluation of all major prejudices as they existed within the chronology of American history. After all, Afro-Americans never possessed a monopoly of white Protestant prejudice. One can even visualize an entire course devoted to a survey of American prejudice.

A proposal to inaugurate a college course entitled A History of American Prejudice sounds like a preposterous put-on. An effort to expose every trace of intolerance in this country's past seems somehow un-American. For those who wrap themselves in the American flag, such a plan probably appears to be another Communist plot to degrade motherhood or to kick benevolent Uncle Sam in the bottom. Nevertheless, this course of study could provide young white Americans with insights concerning the complex nature of prejudice. The National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders named white racism as a primary factor that produces explosive conditions in black ghettos. Critics accused the Commission of irresponsible name calling, but every American history scholar realized that the Commission correctly labelled a dominant force that molded Negro life from slavery days to the present. Any student who studies white racism from the mild condescension of Thomas Jefferson to the virulent race concepts of George Fitzhugh and Ben Tillman, would comprehend the depth of white America's prejudice against the black man.

Such knowledge of past sins may produce guilt feeling among students. People who exhibit too powerful feeling of guilt due to the past actions of a nation or group that they identify with possess a form of mental illness that can incapacitate them. A recognition of past events, however, can lead individuals to wish to improve upon the historical record. A person who realizes that present conditions evolved because of intolerances that were perpetrated in an earlier era may become motivated to work now in order to compensate for the deeds of his ancestors.

A course based on American prejudice can begin with Jamestown's founding and conclude with today's urban crisis. Those first Americans, the Indians, reaped an enormous portion of prejudice held by European immigrants who settled in this country. The Pilgrims felt blessed by an act of God when they discovered that a plague had killed off most of New England's coastal tribes before their landing at Plymouth. Later, after New Englander's surprised and slaughtered more than 500 Pequots who were asleep in their village, Cotton Mather eulogized that with God's help they had sent 500 heathens to their just reward in Hell. Religious beliefs, thus, helped to justify policies toward the American Indian that were based upon land hunger and racial prejudice. Slogans like "the only good Indian is a dead Indian," reveal that white Americans thought that all means were justified in removing inferior red men from valuable western lands.

Religious intolerance fostered by rival Christian denominations existed from colonial times until the present. Massachusetts Puritans banished and sometimes executed heretics who challenged those beliefs that structured their Bible commonwealth. A Catholic minority received rough treatment from Protestant groups throughout our history. Even in Lord Calvert's sanctuary for Catholics, a Protestant majority in 1689 instituted a series of laws that barred Catholics from public office in Maryland. Once Irish peasants began streaming into America's cities in the 1840's and 1850's, anti-Catholicism became linked with a fear that a European scum would erode our institutions. Democracy could no longer survive when an Irish rabble could be swayed by political bosses and papal envoys. From such fears came the "Know Nothing" movement of the 1850's.

Hostilities toward immigrants became explosive again in the 1890's and early 1900's when eastern and southern Europeans began to flock to these shores. A large migration of Russian and Polish Jews sparked a wave of anti-Semitism among nativist groups. As a complement to the usual irrational and emotional feelings of prejudice against foreigners, American intellectuals began to concoct a scientific concept of racism. Leading academicians concluded that peoples from southern and eastern Europe came from inferior races, and that America's bloodlines would become polluted by these lesser stocks unless immigration barriers were erected.

White America's attitudes toward black America comprise another chapter in any survey of prejudice in the United States. The white man's ideas about the Negro ranged from paternalistic views of civilizing African barbarians to candid espousals of maintaining an eternal inferior caste to carry out all society's undesirable labor. Black codes, Jim Crow laws and the more sophisticated segregation practices of the North all reflect this persistent pattern of white racism. Organizations like the Ku Klux Klan and the white citizen's councils would receive clinical analyses in such a course.

Any complete survey of American prejudices would deal with the more subtle nuisances involved in this subject. Students will learn how persecuted minority groups like the Irish took their frustrations out on their black urban neighbors. By studying how upper-class Southerners used racism as a means to keep poor whites and blacks from recognizing their common bond of poverty, one will realize how men cynically manipulate group prejudice for personal ends. In a class devoted exclusively to intolerance, sufficient time will be set aside to depict abuses to Puerto Rican, Japanese and Mexican Americans and religious groups like the Mormons.

Critics will condemn a course on American prejudices as a purveyor of a warped view of American history. Will not such a bleak survey cause naive students to reject their nation's institutions and values? High school graduates, however, usually arrive at college after completing at least one or two courses based on a glorification of America's leaders, laws and customs. Secondary school civic teachers usually accentuate the positive by describing the founding fathers and the Constitution as suitable subjects for stain glass windows. Certainly young people with this type of preparation will be able to withstand a glimpse of the seamy side of American History.

Nevertheless, to protect students from a onesided portrayal that poisons their view of their country, history departments could establish a certain prerequisite before anyone could enroll in a Survey of American Prejudice 101. University officials could stipulate that collegians desiring to take the class on prejudice must first complete a course entitled Great American Deeds and Creeds 100. Students will then be aware of the Declaration of Independence and Thomas Jefferson before they confront the black codes and Simon Legree.

The handsome color illustrations on this and the following three pages were featured in an article on Kenyon in the October, 1969 issue of The Wonderful World of Ohio Magazine,* and are reprinted here with its permission. The magazine, published monthly, has a circulation of 70,000, and goes into every state in the nation and to numerous foreign countries. The WWO captions have been retained, but the general text, which would have been all too familiar to Kenyon alumni, has been replaced by excerpts from a booklet published by The Ohio Historical Society, entitled, "Ohio College Architecture Before 1870," by Eric Johansen.† The booklet comments only on the earlier, Gothic Revival buildings shown on these pages, but it was felt, nevertheless, that many of the observations would be of interest.

Old Kenyon Hall was the original building on the campus at Gambier. Old Kenyon was built in 1829. Today it serves as a symbolic building on the campus, attesting to the school's traditions and greatness. It was destroyed by fire in 1949, but rebuilt in 1950. The new structure matches the exterior of the original building.

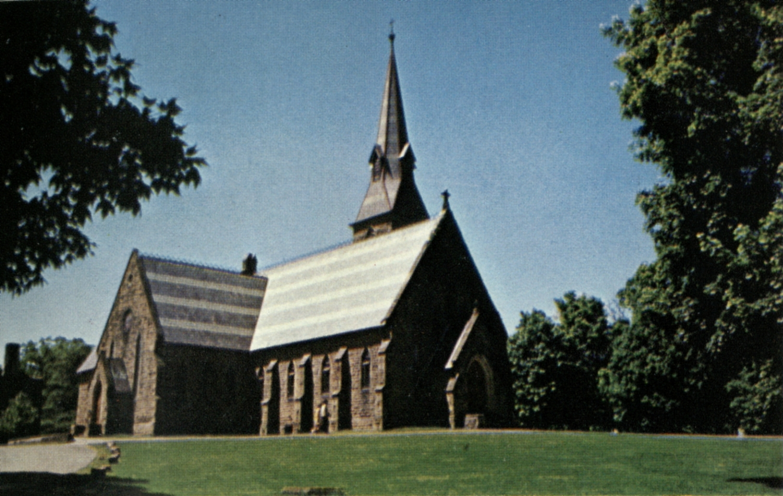

NEARLY a dozen different religious denominations are represented by the colleges founded in Ohio prior to the Civil War. The earliest of these denominational colleges was Kenyon. Founded in 1824 on 8,000 acres, and originally chartered as the Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Ohio.

Its first building, Old Kenyon, is Gothic, and makes Kenyon unique in being the only one of the early Ohio colleges to build in the Gothic Revival Style. The original plan for this first building, made sometime in November, 1826, was the joint work of founder Philander Ascension Hall, above, a classroom and administration building, was named for the Church of the Ascension in New York City. Below, Bexley Hall was the headquarters of the theological seminary and now houses offices of the college staff.

The College Chapel, The Church of the Holy Spirit, was built in 1869 by contributions of the congregation of the Church of the Ascension, New York City. This landmark shows Kenyon's continuing church affiliation.

New Mather Hall, foreground, and Old Mather Hall, background, are the buildings that comprise the science complex at Kenyon. The excellent science program at the school is aided by fine physical facilities for teaching.

Chase, and the Rev. Norman Nash, a many-sided character who was something of an amateur architect. Bishop Chase himself supervised the entire construction work. The spire on the central section, rising to a height of 110 feet, was built from a sketch provided by the great New England architect, Charles Bulfinch. Old Kenyon is the earliest collegiate Gothic building in America, and one of the earliest buildings of the Gothic Revival.

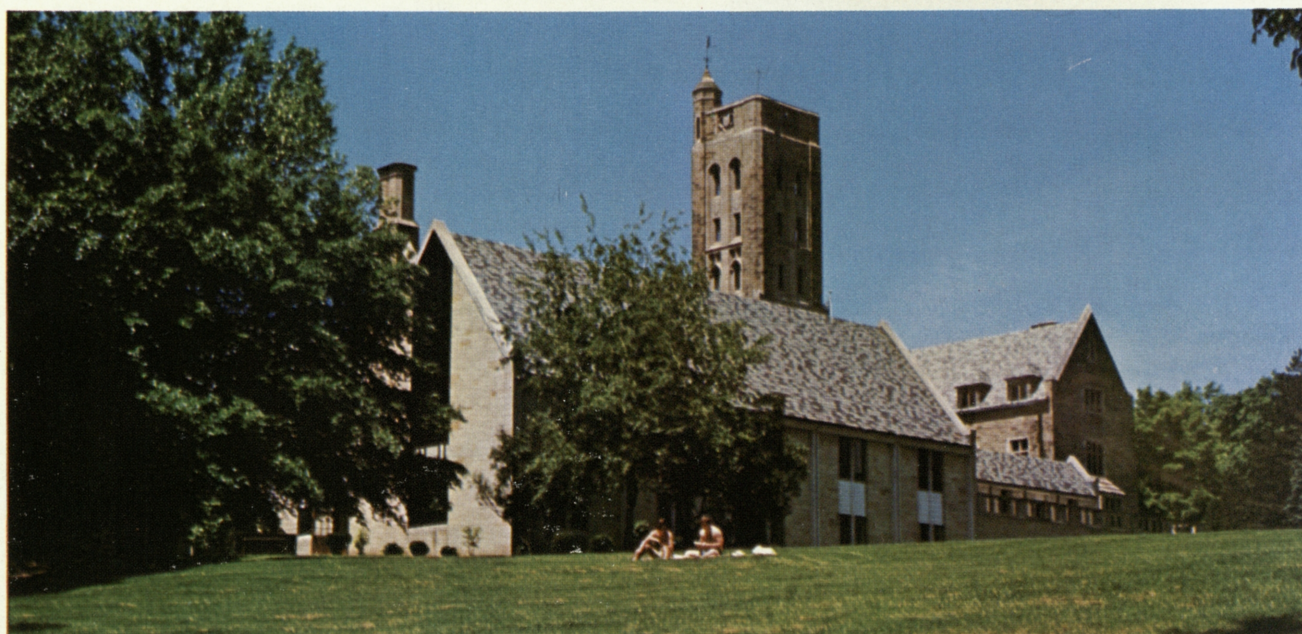

The second Gothic building at Gambier was Bexley Hall, named for Lord Bexley, a principal donor to the college along with the Lords Kenyon and Gambier. Designed in 1834 by Henry Roberts, an English architect, it has been called "pure Elizabethan, that is, Gothic with Renaissance details." It is said to be reminiscent of St. John's College, Cambridge, and further, to show the same kind of thinking that produced the English Houses of Parliament at exactly the same time. Henry Roberts is later said to have collaborated with Sir William Paxton in designing the Crystal Palace of 1851.

Ascension Hall was the third Gothic building to be constructed at Kenyon. It was planned in 1857 by Irish-born architect William Tinsley. The plan (a three-part facade with projecting wings) and the style (Tudor or Gothic) boasts a distinguishing feature in the square crenellated tower that rises taller than the roof of the central block. The historian and critic J. D. Forbes has called it "the best designed and best preserved of Tinsley's works in the Gothic style." Ascension is the only early Kenyon building with any portion of the original interiors intact. The two literary halls on the second and third floors are, architecturally and historically, the most significant, with their handsomely carved woodwork, bracketed beams, and arched screens ornamented with open arcades.

The Gordon Keith Chalmers Memorial Library is named for Kenyon's late president. It can hold over 200,000 volumes and includes a rare book room, seminar rooms, a fine arts room and other facilities for Kenyon's scholars.

Gund Hall and Norton Hall, right, are two of the men's dormitories spotted about the campus. Below, Peirce Hall, the college Commons, has many rooms for student use and a large dining area.

The remaining Gothic building from Kenyon's early period is the Church of the Holy Spirit. Both from the point of view of date (begun 1869) and style, it lies on the threshold of a completely different direction. The characteristics of this tendency is a markedly increased verticality in composition (steep roofs, boldly thrusting towers) heavier masses, more elaborate decoration. As an example, the Church's striped patterned roof is frequently a mark of the High Victorian Gothic.
