Kenyon Anecdotes

When you ask a Kenyon student what he values in your life at Kenyon is a Kenny diversified one. You do a good man things each day, you do whole lot more than you would expect to do in such a small school in such an out of the way place. This being true, you are pretty busy all the time. Hardly ever is there time to read a good book, or even get enough sleep, for the time is too valuable to be an part of education, and especially college education.

Have you ever thought how much time you spend each day going to class? Have you ever considered how much valuable time you could be spending on the same daily routine? Why spend so much time going to class? Well, we have considered and thought about it. And so we have arrived at the conclusion that the only part of the daily march of Kenyon life which is definitely out of step, the only time we spend uselessly, is the time we spend going to class and studying for class.

So we propose the abolition of class at Kenyon. The ten students in each class would be given over to any of their own activities, and the ten teachers would be given over to any of their own activities.

You only need one score of the same daily routine to go through this procedure.

Well, for that matter, perhaps they have!

The Kenyon Review

"While the average institution of so-called higher learning is biding all its efforts to elevating the standing of its athletic teams, any Kenyon is going big time in an entirely different way. The Gamblers football team usually makes little noise, but with the founding of the Kenyon Review, the downtown school moves into the top-flight publications conference. Judged by its influence, the Review has become a national attention given the Yale Review, Virginia Quarterly Review, Southern Review and other university periodicals aimed at the college audience."

The paragraph above, quoted from the editorial column of the Maroon, considers Kenyon's establishment of an undergraduate literary magazine of Kenyon's new quarterly publication. It stands to reason that aide from extending the reputation of the college, it must prove equally significant to its business influence. On the Hill, a granting percent of the student body has subscribed to the magazine. At this rate of growth, there is no doubt that the Review will maintain its accuracy, and will continue to be a must read for all students. Without a doubt the student body has become a conscious of the fact that the Review is an integral part to the college and a support it will need. It is natural that subscribers will read the materials in the Review, and that they will read other similar periodicals to make a complete circle of the student's intellectual habit, and the venture of the Kenyon Review has already proven its worth to Kenyon.

Kenyon Curves

Recently uncovered in the files of the Kenyon College archives is a set of curves that Kenyon College was the site of one of the earliest known scientific studies on the influence of smoking on the health of young men. The study was conducted in the early 1900s, and its results showed that smoking was positively correlated with a variety of health problems, including heart disease and lung cancer.

The study was led by Dr. John Barlow, a professor of physiology at Kenyon College, and it used a sample of 100 students. The students were divided into two groups: one group smoked cigarettes, while the other did not. The smoking group was tracked for 10 years, while the non-smoking group was tracked for 5 years. The study found that the smoking group had a higher incidence of heart disease and lung cancer than the non-smoking group.

The study was groundbreaking at the time, as it was one of the first to demonstrate a link between smoking and health problems. It also helped to establish smoking as a public health issue, and it contributed to the eventual passage of regulations that limited smoking in public places.
