The reaction to the first issue was as expected. Some people read it and didn't like it; others liked a few things in it. For the most part, however, the whole matter disappeared in a mad rush for a table at dinner time. This, we repeat, is to be expected; it is a common fate for all Collegians. However, this action resulted in an interesting response.

Apparently, our front cover and masthead are vaguely reminiscent of Iliak, a condition which becomes even more strikingly true upon running the thumb lightly over the surface. Couple this defect with a bad lunch, and you have the inevitable outcome. Thus we stand accused of not mixing our prescribed fifty-fifty ingredients in the proper portions.

To these plaintiffs we can only promise to do our best, yet we still affirm, with trepidation, that our earthy newsmprint must remain wrapped in a glossy esoteric coating. In short, we like our cover.

Now, we think that the bold transgressor into our hermetically sealed pages is likely to find that, in one way or another, there is something to everyone's liking. Of course, this only refers to those who are impressed by something but this world tends to be imperfect. Whoever does not like a literary critique may consider the issue that much shorter and turn to the other features; the same applies to those who have no desire to read about athletic events. In any case, we deem it our duty to reproduce herein the outstanding activities and accomplishments of the hard-working student, however exclusive his interests may appear to others. Such persons and activities must be of universal interest to the student. It is our sincere wish that more students take this to heart and give us the sort of material we need to make this magazine a success.

To those others who took the time to separate the good from the bad in the last issue, we give heartfelt thanks, and hope that, in a few more words, we can make ourselves better known to you. Your criticism was mostly adverse, and rightly so. Our first issue was not exactly a shining star, but it was for the most part a child stumbling through its first solo walk. But if you bear with us, we aver that we have profited greatly from the experience.

For we have made some of the awful discoveries that the young writer must make, and among them that most astounding of all, that writing is not at all like reading. We mean that when a man reads, he finds that he can assume a thousand roles, from Achilles to Alfred Prufrock, and can accept any of these diverse creations as equally effective expressions of his own thought. He participates in these roles as he does not actually be the vicarious creator of them. But upon taking up the pen himself, he discovers that he must commit an act of violence to these countless possibilities and obliterate all but one. And he sees that for this distinctly individual role, he is the only person to answer for its shortcomings.

It is disconcerting, then, that after the young man has tried out all of the hypothetical positions with his straight-edge razor on the invulnerable mirror, he should sit his throat on the first try anyway. It is at best anti-climactic—like an aerialist promising to drop a hundred feet into a five-foot tub, unscathed, and then missing the tub altogether. At worst our author has dreamed of being Achilles for the sake of marching home, a hero, but he got killed on the battlefield instead.

But that which reigns over all, the idea, has been preserved and improved. Once more we march into the breech. We hope that the banner has fallen behind while the good continues to nourish itself with its own productivity.

Sincerely,
The Editors

October saw a wealth of activity hit the autumn-hued campus, some of it leaving its markers streaming in the first gray light of November, yet other aspects of the month's happenings more intangible, more lasting.

Visiting at Kenyon College during the second week were the Misses Alice and Margaret Bodine, daughters of the Rev. William B. Bodine, president of the college and Dean of Berkeley Hall from 1876 to 1880. The sisters were entertained by the Sunday noon singing in the Commons, left with the college newly-discovered letters between the Rev. Bodine, Rutherford B. Hayes and the two Shermanas, William Tecumseh and John... that weekend, meeting in the Alumni House biology and chemistry teachers from various secondary schools throughout the country conferred on the study of admission to college with advanced standing... the initial college dance went revelling and reeling by.

"Tawny Pipit" was presented to Kenyon men in Rosse Hall on Sunday eve... .

With the richly-colored foliage of autumn providing a fitting setting, Homecoming descended upon the Hill and the Lords descended upon Bobert in a rousing upset. The campus played host to Kenyon men from all over the East, particularly New York and Pennsylvania, as well as the midwest... . W. C. FIELDS added his little bit to the general proceedings with "My Little Chickadee" in Rosse Hall... . Two days later we had the eminent psychologist Prof. Wolfgang Kohler from Swarthmore by way of Tubingen, Ben and Berks Universities as well as others, speaking before an overflow audience in the Speech Building, overlooking the fecundity of recent local events for a more whole if not entirely elucidating picture of Gestalt psychology and the most recent developments in that field... .

Another week of time-killing routines interspersed with education heralded the third weekend of October. The "Well-Digger's Daughter" and a number of other, somewhat less collegiate femme fatales paid a visit and were well-received by most. A square dance in Pierce Hall on Friday evening slipped by rather wistfully. As the Day of De-

Kenyon Makes Predictions

MOCK ELECTION

As the national election approached this past November 4th, Kenyon proved itself to be a most energetic part of the universal thrrob. Fever ran high enough to make our mock election seem nothing less than a world-shaking event.

With a voting turnout of 80%, we proved ourselves better than the whole nation in that department. In the choice of the president we apparently predicted a national trend, although we gave Eisenhower an almost two-to-one victory. But beyond that, we did not throw at universally. In defiance of present reality, we gave the election to Di-Salle over Bricker by two votes, and to Taft over Lausche by about seventy. According to the reports of those who tabulated the votes, the students frequently crossed party lines in selecting the man of their choice.

The whole affair was administered by members of a Political Science class, one objective being to see how and where parity lines were crossed. There was also a crew present who, for the sake of the advancement of learning, spent a good part of their afternoon observing or off so that no one might vote twice.

NEW BOOKSTORE

The latest addition to the humbling little town of Gambier, Ohio, has been the opening of Dr. Denham Sutcliffe's secondhand bookstore. Originally established in the College Bookshop in the fall of 1929, it has come into its own, occupying the space behind Wilson's Barber Shop. To own a secondhand bookstore has long been one of Dr. Sutcliffe's greatest desires. The bug bit about eleven years ago, but has only now been fulfilled.

Although a vast amount of knowledge is required to run a bookstore, Dr. Sutcliffe regards it as only a hobby. In the small amount of leisure time available, he finds great pleasure in spending a few hours at the shop. Some men collect baseball cards, etc., for a hobby, he says he, "I run a second-hand bookstore."

When asked how one goes about getting into the book-selling business, Dr. Sutcliffe replied, "You go out and buy some books." Actually the process is much more complicated than that. A book collector buys books at auctions, out of private homes, and by means of own and newspaper advertising, to name a few methods. He estimates the potential retail value of his stock at two or three thousand dollars.

The new shop is a large single room with bookshelves built by the proprietor himself. At present the prices range between five cents and fifty dollars. In the fifty dollar class are those collector's items which he acquires from time to time.

COFFEE SHOP

After a year-long hiatus, the evening Coffee Shop go has once again become a Kenyon institution. Evidently most people are overjoyed at this, and it is in these people in particular that we send our plen to help make the institution last this time.

There are problems from the very outset. The economic difficulties, for example, are already threatening to be as imposing as the ones which caused it to close down at night last year. Labor is, by a universal standard, worth 20 to 25% of the total cost. At the same time, it pays $13 per night, which means that the gross income should be at least $52 per-night, a figure that has not been met. Instead, the cost of labor has averaged 33.3% per night. This does not include the added expense of the extra hour of maintenance work in Pierce Hall at night, or the extra effort required to organize the cash register the following morning.

Among the other problems is the recently noted trouble with the soda fountain. That being handled in this writing, and the Shop will be in working order again at no extra expense for the new equipment. Fortunately, a special fund has taken care of that.

However, the problems that every young economist knows are prevailed by a small business remain. Where there is no sort of large scale output, profit and loss must be considered with the piece by piece. Hence, slow hours are harmful, and small sales do not cost proportionately less than larger ones.

But these are not the most important matters to us, Miss Kimball does not like to see an output from an unpopular lunch down to the Coffee Shop. Good morale is more important than an hour's good business down in the shop. But it is a matter of morale, morals, and a lot of other things that everyone pays his check immediately upon leaving. With a little cooperation we can make the most pleasant institutions go on for a long time.

THE MYSTERY OF THE MISSING SILVERWARE

It was a cold, foggy night in the village of Gambiershire, and we had been chased closely around the first pleasant institutions go on for a long time. I cried, "But—how did you know?"

The silverware! The silverware!" gasped the young man. He fell dead, coughing up a little colored object which clattered horribly on the floor. It was a little plastic spoon.

"Follow me," said the great man, and we dashed out across the ghostly moor. The ancient towers of the Hall of Pierce was visible before us.

"But—how did you know?" I queried.

"The corners of his mouth, my dear simple-minded colleague. There were fragments of cheese souffle on them."

"Gad!" I exclaimed.

We were walking through the long misty corridors. Through the gloom one could hear the ghostly click of billiard balls.

"It's true!" my colleague explained. "The silverware is gone!"

"But..." I spluttered.

"No time to explain," he said, "Follow me!" I gasped.

We were taken on the tour again, and the great chapel spire of Gambiershire rose up before our eyes. The Bookshop was a noisy, hot mess. The great silver chequer was lying from that ancient landmark.

"Ha!" said the great man. "There!"

There was a silverly gleam in the gloom. It was the missing treasure!

"Humph!" he sniffed. "There's a note attached." He held it out with a steady hand, covered with characters obviously gathered from newspaper clippings. It read:

"Dear Giras, we pray you rise up and dreams abound. That's where the silverware is found."

"What?" I said. "But, how and how?"

"Empirically evident," he replied with that inscrutability for which he was esteemed. "I received my first clue in the dining hall. There were pigeon feathers on the high table."

"Ah!" I cried. "That is impossible!"

"Yes," he replied, taking out his new Hohner chromatic, "pigeon feathers. This immediately called to my mind the gigantic pigeons that we were said to have let loose in the hall centuries ago. Astonishing tale. Apparently there is a ghost of some trained and student that everything who was unable to choose between Mather and Ascension. The spectre of his split personality is the tower of this day. There was such a book who, I am told, hung a mobile composed of tin cans and paper, and who, on the reading room some years ago. Some believe that he was originally the pulpit of Oxford, where he performed similar feats. And, you see, it was this same phantom who once filled the pipes of the chapel organ with flour. Since the culprit always returns to the scene of the crime, I came hither."

"Amazing!" I said.

But he need not my compliment. He lifted his harmonica to his lips and began to play a superb arrangement of the familiar air.

HORSES

The scene is a wind-swept moor in Gambier, Ohio. The time is a pleasant autumn afternoon. A faint noise is brought to the listener's ear by the dull sound of the distant wind, suggesting that the event on the horizon was the preferred destination for the band. In the heat of the moment, however, the only thing that mattered was the music. The band performed with such precision and harmony that the audience was spellbound. The music was a powerful expression of the group's talent and creativity. It was as if they were communicating something beyond words, reaching out to their audience on a deeper level. The performance was a testament to the power of music and its ability to connect people on an emotional level. It was a moment that would be remembered for a long time to come.
by the rising wind, a sound impossible in nature, but nevertheless insinuating itself on the consciousness like one sure heard hoofbeats. Then with a rush and a roar they are upon us: “Voila, damn it! Voila!” and with sudden surprise we realize that the Cavalry Regulars, Kenyon’s Division has arrived. But what strange uniform! grey gaiters, button-down shirts, fowls, and tweedy coats! All this may seem strange to the casual bystander, but what he doesn’t realize is that the horses have arrived from the Breckinridge-Gravelle (no offense intended). This, then, is the cause of all the above effects, and if one takes a really close look at the Cavalry Regulars, he discovers that they are composed of men, byanalized, of members of Kenyon’s exclusive “Riding Club.”

This organization, headed as John Lyons, is dedicated to the proposition that why walk when you can ride? For a nominal fee, you too, can join the Riding Club, and for a nominal fee, you can participate in their sole activity, riding. By following the road just below Dorothy’s Lunch to its happy conclusion, one finds oneself at the doorstep of Kenyon’s old stables now being used as working headquarters of the Riding Club.

Additional notices: the Dean has asked equestrians to kindly (1) stay off middle path for reasons best left unsaid. Also, John Lyons asked the members of the Riding Club to “get out there and ride.”

There is a tradition that eminently mounted, gentleman decide to start a school of agriculture. Ivy was planted and dormitories soon began to grow. The gentleman with mutton-chops kept himself busy, teaching the classes and ringt he bell at the same time, which shows that not only was he versatile, but he was the two people.

The study of agriculture began to decline when the cider-press broke down. But at this time a bunch of subversive thugs from the south side of an Indian village called “Chicago” dug somewhere in something.

Then a woman’s college was founded, and female students began studying Shakespeare intensively, like how Romeo climbed walls by lying bedheads together. However, the constant presence of women took away the sweet surprise of dance weekends, so they (the women) were banished.

And now, the cultural atmosphere remains unbroken, save by an occasional vision of splashing water or unraveled tissue paper. Students are pleased by their newly opened coffee-shop, although they know through their vast learning, that men does not live by cheeseburgers alone.
ON THE RESULTS OF THE ELECTION

by J. A. Roloto

The results of the past election have been sufficiently—albeit not excessively—analyzed, appraised, praised, and refuted. This feable voice from the General wilderness comes not so much to cast aspersions or register satisfaction, but to declare its own interpretation of results and to prophecy (the consolation of the defeated) future trends. Lacking the scientific precision of Univac and the allegedly perfected methods of Maera Gallup, Roper, and Crosley, I rely on a combination of evidence taken from the polls and personal evaluation based on the evidence. The only certainty that accompanies my predictions is that they will be refuted by some, questioned by some, and accepted by some. (The last category will assuredly be the smallest, though the more enlightened.)

Those in sympathy with the Cleveland Plain Dealer and its Washington correspondent Walker S. Buel will accept the thesis that... Eisenhowers overwhelming victory at the polls dramatically marked the passing of the “New Deal-Pair Deal” era and the dawn of a new political day in the United States. To these the millennium has arrived. To those who pledged allegiance to Mr. Stevenson and the Democratic principles, the millennium is now ending. It seems, however, that both of these statements are the usual emotional declarations of the victor and vanquished after battle. They contain excessive portions of elation and bitterness and not enough realistic analysis. At the time of this writing, the most intelligent commentary has come from Democratic Governor Shivers of Texas who supported Eisenhower and helped carry that state for the General. Shivers himself was re-elected with the blessings of both parties and contends the Eisenhower victory was certainly not a refutation of the Democratic party. It was, he says, a reaction of the people against the Truman type of politics and department. (Not necessarily against his decisions of policy.) This appears to be the truth of the situation and I believe my evidence supports this argument. The Chicago Daily News (pro-Eisenhower) declared: “It was Trumanism that lost, and not Stevenson.” It goes on to indicate that General Eisenhower’s personality made his victory assured from the moment of his nomination. As early as the New Hampshire primaries the personal popularity (as against other Republicans) was indicated, and the inroads into the solidarity of the Democratic party were shown by the victories of Kefauver over Truman. Here was a clear decision of personalities which was to be repeated throughout the land, primary after primary. The London Daily Telegraph writes: “In American federal politics, personalities play a larger part than ideas.” It appears that the personality of Stevenson, though described by pro-Ike Philadelphia Evening Bulletin as “a man of high principle, great ability, and sound patriotism,” was too closely associated with that of Mr. Truman despite the great difference in their personal traits.

Eisenhower’s victory bandwagon carried the Republicans into Congressional control, though these victories did not match his own landslide. It was assuredly a personal vote, rather than a party victory. McCarthy’s margin was substantially less than Ike’s. Bricker’s loss, Sen. Reed’s champion) defeated Sen. Cain of Washington defeated. I must agree with syndicated writer Philip Porter who states that “Bob Taft, Warren, Dewey, Stassen—none of them could have done it.” It was Eisenhower who won—not the Republican party. It was the personality of Harry S. Truman with whom he surrounded himself that lost—not the New Deal as a principle. Why did Gov. Shively, Sen. Byrd, Gov. Kennon, Gov. Byrnes abandon the national ticket so closely identified with Truman, and yet not desert the party or their local Democratic candidates?

In support of this last statement, I present the statistics of the pre-election polls. I think it is generally admitted that they were conservative in their estimates and narrowed the gap between the candidates although their figures did not warrant it. They assigned the undecided vote from 20 to 30 to 1 Democratic. Their latest figures indicated Eisenhower—54%; Stevenson—40%; Undecided—6%. Only a 3 to 1 Democratic distribution of the undecided could result in a victory. Here lay the fault. However, to the question “Which party would you say is best for the people like yourself?” the latest answers were: Democrats—50%; Republicans—30%. No committed—20%. From these figures of the same organization can be drawn evidence that even though in sympathy with the Democratic principles, the many voters “crossed lines” and voted for the figure of Dwight D. Eisenhower.

The next statement will probably raise many a questioning eyebrow and well it might for it is based partly on supposition. The unprecedented total vote cast in the past election certainly indicates that great numbers of those groups which had previously been most negligent were attracted to the polls. Past statistics show that the American housewife and the elderly female group have been among the most neglectful of their franchise. I will not (though a good case might be made for it) indulge in the argument that Eisenhower’s personal charm and the political exploitation of Mamie has great bearing on this group, but will assume that the group is more susceptible to the charges of “high prices,” “blood money,” “sons drafted and dying in Korea.” Nixon’s many TV appearances were aimed at the housewife who views the nation’s economy largely in the light of her grocery bill while ignoring the many other complexities of price indexes, relative wage increases etc. Furthermore he exploited parental emotions by making the “forgotten man” apply itself to our soldiers in Korea. With or without challenging the validity of his charges, one must admit they were Election day came and even peaceful Gamma was not unmoved. The eternal and lasting things, literature, philosophy, theology, were set aside for a moment, letting all passion for learning be poured instead into the proceedings of the world's most important event. And, quickly enough, it ended, leaving behind the varied reactions in close enough quarters for the somber ones to be able to hear the rejoicing out on the path. One member of the Republican club peered into a room and announced: "As Kenyon goes, so goes the nation." A Kenyon professor was seen in tattered garb shortly afterwards, selling apples from door to door. In short, he who would affirm that our cloistered academy is not at all interested in more temporary affairs simply has not seen around this Fall.

That Kenyon was feeling its oats in this election became most evident in the succession of lively, if not downright bombastic, election assemblies which were held in Rosse Hall this year. The cries resounded incessantly from week to week until peaceful Kenyon suddenly became aware that it held its own rightfully respectable place in history, that we are students after all and it has long been the place of us to raise a hue and cry whenever they realize that something is being put over on both ourselves and their more docile elders. I refer to any faint realization that this is, after all, the nation of Daniel Webster, John Calhoun and, God save us! Patrick Henry.

Of course, other elements went into our baptism, among which the most predominant was, I think, the worldly influence of nearby cities. Some few of us got to Columbus and farther to hear the leading candidates. But it was Mr. McNiven who a good many more of us got to. There we heard at different times Senator Sparkman and Bricker and a good time was had by all.

It was on the day of Senator Sparkman's speech that the young Republicans took Kenyon's first step into the world and hearkened back to their highly cultured but rarely emulated forefathers. They were got to it, they were got to it. All day, in fact, that they were got to it, they might have been got to it.

When the door was opened, there was a great rush of people, but I am not sure that the most "high" of them knew what to do. My father, at the nation's door, had been told that he had to be got to it. He did it, but I am not sure that he was got to it.

These events, merely seeds, blossomed on the day of the speech that Mr. Fred Milligan of Columbus delivered a speech. On this day could be no doubt that we had left the cloister, as evidenced immediately by the glittering spray of campaign posters which decorated the otherwise venerable and properly brown Rosse Hall. Water seeks its own level, so they say, and so Mr. Milligan got splashed with his own sort of questionable rhetoric. Mr. Milligan was admirably good-humored, so that the whole thing, both inside and outside of Rosse Hall, turned into a rousing political stump-sea

This mounting spirit suffered a temporary setback, however, when Mr. Michael DiSalle appeared and struck a blow under the belt, or above the neck, so to speak, and appealed to no other faculty but intelligence. It was indeed the best showing we had all year, although no one's hair bristled, no pores expanded, no hearts pulsed in proto, which probably explains why Mr. DiSalle lost the election.

But this momentary check upon the outpouring of our wild oats only served to enrich our abilities for the main event. Upon hearing that Senator John W. Bricker was coming to speak at Kenyon, a group of scholars who were well-versed in the Declaration of Independence and other documents of American history decided that it would not only be prudent, but frankly constitutional, to hold a small demonstration. The thing was done with dispatch and decorum, and apparently the Senator noticed it. Some people did not like it, but that, presumably, is because they did not know that when Shakespeare had written the first line of of Hamlet, the writing paper wasn't clean any more.

Thus did Kenyon live one of the most ancient dramas in the world this Fall. Like Telemachus, we went out into the world political and Sports

Kenyon has had few all-around athletes to compare with Senior Ron Fraley. Whatever the season, this young powerhouse can be seen hustling out on the playing field or on the courts.

The story was no different at Steubenville High School, where Ron also played the three major sports, winning a total of nine letters. He now reminisces about the days at dear old Steubenville, ranking high as fifth place in his Junior year. That was the year that he contributed five touchdowns to the team. He recalls in particular the big games against Massillon and McKinley that season. Massillon was their hated rival, and the victor in many of their previous contests. Steubenville was leading 13-0 at the half, so that the Steubenville Herald Star was confident enough to publish the verdict announcing Steubenville's first victory over Massillon in seven years. But it turned out to be something like the (1948) presidential election. Steubenville lost, 20-13, and all was silent. The McKinley game was a happier time, in which Steubenville held the favorite to a scoreless tie. Even at this time, incidentally, Ron was showing his special talents as a defensive backer.

He showed his abilities in high school basketball also, averaging thirteen points a game in his Junior year, putting the team to a 16-5 record. As captain of the team in his Senior year, he was high scorer with an average of better than fifteen points a game. That year he reached a high of 27 points in one game, against Martin's Perry.

In baseball he played center field, second base, and when the pitcher was tired he took that job also. Ron will never forget his big hit against Weirton High when he was a sophomore. There were two men on base, and that was how many runs Steubenville needed to tie the game. Ron bunted and swung with everything he had and the best thing that could have happened did happen. The ball went a mile, and after a moment of astonishment Ron took off, not stopping until he had reached third base. But at the end of the inning the coach's only comment was an angered observation that Ron could have made it a home run if he hadn't stopped to gaze at the wall.

Ironically enough, Ron suffered his most disheartening baseball experience against the very same team the following year. His pitching in one of these games had a 3-1 lead going into the last half of the final inning. With two men on, Patrick, Weirton's star hitter, stepped up to the plate. He had already slammed two hits that game, and was a formidable opponent. Ron got three balls on him, and with the way Patrick was going it might have been a good idea to throw another one wide. But Ron couldn't bear the thought of walking such a good opponent, so he delivered a "fast" pitch which Patrick promptly sent over the fence, to win the ball game. Ron's batting average these years was always over .300. His best pitching record was the one for his Senior year, in which he won seven games, including two one-hitters, and lost only two.

When the time came to think of going to college, Kenyon was just one of many possibilities, but it won out because of its high academic standing. Both Ron and Kenyon have been happy with the choice. Despite his being on the playing field all year long, he has maintained a better than 3.60 average here.

At Kenyon, Ron added to his list of accomplishments, winning a letter in that as well as the to-be-expected football, basketball, and baseball.

In basketball he has averaged 12 points per game for the two seasons he has played thus far, with a high in one game of 26 points against Denison, in his Sophomore year. He expects a good season this year if the new prospects shine as anticipated.

He has been playing center and left field in college baseball, but is unable to pitch because of bone chips in his right elbow that is the result of a freshman football injury. Once last year, on the team trip to Florida, he tried pitching, but his sore arm prevented him from even finishing the game. One of his most memorable college baseball experiences took place against Denison. When he was out in the last half of the seventh inning, he hit a two-run triple, to give the Lords a 4-3 victory.

But football is of course the glowing sport. One of Ron's first loves, and it was his first sport at Kenyon. When he entered, freshmen were not allowed to play intercollegiate football, but he was able to show his abilities on the freshman team, scoring one of the touchdowns in the 20-19 upset over Wittenberg that year.

In his Sophomore year, Ron was a vital part of that undefeated season. At that time he was a part-time offensive halfback and a regular defensive line-backer. He scored two touchdowns that year.

The story has gotten better ever since, so that this year Ron has given us one of the most impressive performances Kenyon has seen. As co-captain, he has been one of the team's iron men, playing sixty minutes a game and driving all the while. Primarily a runner, he has driven for four touchdowns in the first five games, and has thrown passes as well, most notably a Citation 63 yard heave against Hobart to help his team beat them 14-13. Defensively he has been a rock, and there is rarely a tackle that Ron is not making part of.

Ron hopes to go to law school next year. There can be no doubt that he will be a standout there, and there will be to Kenyon's credit as well as to his own. Yet we still must feel a little reluctant to let him go.

The Kenyon football team, downed in its first two games this year, has surged back to win three straight at this writing. The play of Don Cabriele, Ron Fraley, Don Marsh and Bill Lowry has been outstanding all year, and particularly in the victories over Hobart (14-8), Capital (29-27), and Ashland (46-14).

The win over the heavily favored Hobart eleven was achieved in part by being carried to Don Marsh, one thrown by Don Cabriele and the other by Ron Fraley. In the Capital and Ashland games Cabriele threw a total of six touchdowns passes, showing himself to be one of the finest quarterbacks in the conference. The running, passing and all-around defensive play of Ron Fraley has been a memorable farewell to Kenyon in this, his final season. Also, the play of Ron's roommate Lowry, who was not able to play against Miami, and Batch Ollinger on the offensive shows much promise for the future. On the defense the work of Bob McAllister, Dick Jankowski and Jack Harrison has been especially noteworthy.
He turned slowly, his hands in the pockets of his pants, and looked back at the footprints of his footsteps in the sand along the water's edge. The wind whipped against his back, whipped at the tears in his brown leather jacket and at his face. He thought of the thousands of gulls which had been there in the sand in the hot summers before. He thought of the people running and Folding the loose sand high in the air... and the sand and their muck. Now in the cold there were only his feet to mark the smooth beach. He was there, and the wind was there, burning raw gulls out of the East... and the sky was there, funerally shrunked. The stillness was broken only by the interminant caws of a hungry gull as he dove and hit at the water and by the waves stopping incessantly patiently at the sand. He wondered if he could bear the stinging cold if he stood still and the water reached his feet. If it climbed to his thighs, if at last it played in his hair. He laughed then, out loud because he knew no one was there to hear him. The gull seemed to answer his laugh with a sudden deep shriek, he started back fearfully. His head snapped in every direction but there was nothing, and the gull had passed on. He climbed the gentle slope of the beach and settled in a clump of coarse grass on top of a sand-dune. The wind swept at the base of the dune and threw the sting in his face. He just looked.

Richard Ekel sat on a dune and stared at the water. A woman sat on a little salto box about three miles from the beach, up on the hill, and thumbed lazily through a magazine, not attempting to read in the dull, gray light of the afternoon, which coming through the small square window behind her head, only half lit the room. Occasionally she would bend to straighten the housecoat over her knees or to push a sprig of the ivy by the window from the back of her graying head. A lamp stood fruitlessly next to the arm of the couch. She would look now and then at the lamp and back at the open page. She would look and turn the page, and the backs of her hands stood out in blue ridges. She was waiting for the ringing at the door, but she set the magazine down only when the brass knocker seemed about to be spent against the panels.

The man stood stiff in his trench coat, his face grim and cold like the afternoon. He moved to better set his heels on the uneven flagstone steps.

"Is he here?" He spoke quickly, passively.

The woman stared without answering.

"He really isn't here?"

The woman gestured as if to open the house to him.

"Don't answer then."

The woman closed the heavy door gently leaning against it for a moment and then wandered back toward the regular living room. She tripped awkwardly over a sill which rose about an inch from floor separating the front hall from the living room. It angered her momentarily. She knew she had never tripped over that sill in twenty-five years. She remembered how the children used to run through the house and trip over the sill and how she had wanted to scream at them. She could not remember ever actually screaming at them. As she passed in front of the mirror which rested on the mantle over the fireplace she fluffed her hair almost without looking. She sat down again heavily and plopped the magazine open in her lap.

"Is he here?" she mumbled out loud looking up.

"No, he isn't here," she answered herself. "But he will be."

Her eyes stared blurring the page before her and she smiled.

"He will come to his mother."

And then minutes later there was the overcoat and the brief case bending over her and brushing her forehead. She did not tell her husband then, or ever, but the man who had stood and shifted his heels on the flagstone steps.

They chatted about it every once in awhile down in the village, the men sitting at the bar in Gaenki's Restaurant... the women down at Miss Bishop's salon. No one really knew much about what had happened but the tale sometimes took more than an hour to tell. And it developed more violently and more romantically each time it was told. The whispers grew louder and the heads nodded more. The men sitting on the stools would cross their knees uncomfortably and try to make each other understand how it was when it happened to your head. And they would forget about him and it would become a story of heads and about the kind of people who were walking around loose these days. Joe Olson, the drug store clerk, said one day he couldn't see how it could happen to his kind on account of his mother never let him out of her sight or let him mix with a wild bunch except when he snuck off. No matter who chose to tell the story, to a stranger or just to tell it over again, he would always begin and end the same way, and always the head shaking.

"Now of course none of us ever really knew the boy well, but he never seemed the same."

Gaenki, behind the bar, looked out over the neon sign at the gray afternoon and fingered his cigar from one corner of his mouth to the other. He was dodging the hazard where one of his feet was."

"Funny about some people, eh?" he said.

"I never seen his old man in here for a drink," one of the men at the bar piped suddenly.

"His old man wouldn't want to drink in here," Gaenki returned, "but the kid did." Everyone laughed at this.

"And plenty," Gaenki continued and everyone laughed again.

"Tell off that stool once."

"And they laughed again.

"Came in here one morning I just opened," continued Gaenki, enjoying having his humor appreciated, and bringing a god-damn glass in his hand. "And some of the men looked at each other with hesitant half-smiles, but nobody laughed. Gaenki bent quickly behind the bar and began filling the sink with hot water.
The ever darkening afternoon succumbed quickly without a twilight to a black evening. The wind was growing stronger, as mist around the streetlights promised that the fog would roll in. Already the horn in the light-house far out on the reef had begun its ritual of moans, and the moans swelled up the streets from the beach, and the villagers swarmed a little faster to get home out of the heavy cold. The lighthouse sat on a mound of rocks at the very end of a sandbar which stretched about two miles out from the beach. If you walked rapidly, you could go out to the light and back at dead low tide without ever getting your feet wet. Some people in the village called it Wake-land Reef because old Mister Wake-land had been keeper of the light for about sixty years, ever since he was a young boy. He could always be heard to boast at least once when he was in town that he had never had to use the boat getting to and from the light to shore, and that he had never gotten his feet wet in sixty years. “I know the tides,” he would say. “It’s just known tides ... even at night!”

Richard Elsin knew the tides. He got up stiff and shivering from the sand, and looked about him at the nothingness which was the night and the beach, the bare lightness of the sand at his feet and the black and even splash. The tide had started out about an hour previous, for faintly distinguishable was the ribbon of dark wet sand showing how far the water had receded. The gusts which had threatened an Easterly storm during the afternoon had died to nothing. It was the fog now which hung threatening, hung just off shore plored like a great wave. Richard Elsin started down the beach toward the little bay town, Wakeland Reef. This was the time to start, he thought to himself, when the water’s gone an hour and a half. He would remember playing pirates halfway out on the reef when he was a child and he could remember his mother running after him and promising him he would drown someday. He remembered that he had always loved the beach and he thought it must have been because he could run swift on the hard sand near the water and it took longer for some one to catch him back. He could remember being threatened that he could not go to the beach if he ran away. He remembered his mother as an arm, as nails which dug into his thin, brown shoulder and gave his belly a wrenching and screaming thing trying to catch its toes in the puff of air as he walked counting the steps he took between the intermittent moans from the end of the reef, he thought of his mother as an arm which had handed him to the tensed and alien circle of another world. He had taken him away from his beach in the day and the night, taken him from the loving sound of the horn.

He was on the reef now. He looked for the light although he knew he would not be able to see it being about to disappear and reappearing as his eyes were able to penetrate about his feet. He walked with his feet farther apart than usual so that he could feel the bump back of the reef it until he got closer. Not many big boats ever passed this close to the bay anymore so they had never got a stronger light. There was just the sound of the echo of the horn. The reef stretched out in front of him in the filmy gray and the black, and know he was walking straight. He thought of himself how easily a person could become bewildered and panicked on the reef in the dark and the knowing of where he was running in shore or out to sea. would run crazily from side to side into the water until at last there would be no sides and no shore and only the water rising. He saw himself running crazily in circles on the reef and screaming at the water to stay back, but he laughed and he had no fear, and the horn sounded immediately ashore. And he thought, the horn is the sound of my mother’s voice when sometimes she would say goodnight to me in the dark. He was sorry immediately that he had thought of that, she was not like the sound of the horn. The sound of the horn did not whisper in the dark that he was not like the others ... you are not like the others ... you are not like the others.

Old Mr. Wakeland stood next to the light as silently it completed its circuit and started around again. It never bothered him. Mr. Wakeland thought he had the light bathe him in binding light momentarily as it caught him in the path. He stood there looking upward as the brilliant yellow would silhouette his figure as if in vague communication. His timeless reverie was suddenly shocked by the slap of footsteps which resounded quivering up the long steep spiral stairs. He turned and squinted down into the blackness of the stair well, but all he could distinguish was the white back of a hand advancing in jerks up the tenth of the iron railing until at last there was a face, and a body, and the feet stopping, and then the voice which said. “It’s only me,” as if it could have been no other.

“Where else?”

“You could not go to them that hate the water.”

“No.”

The old man strangely kept his place hovering at the top of the stairs looking down into the face of Richard Elsin who stood several steps below. He started to speak again to the face below but the horn was suddenly swaying and then the noise had trailed off into the fog, he said nothing. The old man thought of the times he had looked down the spiral stairs to see the boy coming up to him. He had not really been a boy, the old man remembered, but a man. He had seemed just like a boy because he would come and sit on the floor and he would play as if he lived there, and he would stay until the very last minute before the tide would start covering the reef, and then he would run back on the hard sand with his chest thumping wildly. The old man remembered how once he had not come to light for five or six weeks and when he had come there was a haunted look in his eyes and his face was pale and run down and the old man could not understand how he could be so pale in the summer. And then he had come one day and said, “My mother was sick ... and then he had never come back again ... until now, here in the fog. The old man had found out why he didn’t come on one of his trips to town, and he had heard that some of the people in the village were saying that he, Old Wake-land, had been trying something funny out on the reef and had been trying to keep the boy from his mother by telling him crazy stories. The old man had wanted to say that it was the boy that had told the crazy stories, but he couldn’t say that because somehow he had never been able to dis-believe them. He could never think crazy of the boy because the boy loved the water, and the fog, and the wind, and the stillness of it all. And running on the beach ... and this was the old man’s life, his was his faith. He had wondered about the boy because there had taken him away, he wondered if he had missed something. He was wondering now when Richard Elsin looked up at him and spoke.

“I wouldn’t go back to her, and they wanted me too.”

“That hates the water don’t love us.”

“I told them I lived here.”

“In the water.”

“Yes, I told them in the ‘water.’”

Mr. Wakeland turned and walked back toward the great circling beam and thought how the light should be purging white, but white was. The horn crashed, bomb-like on the silence, and when the old man turned around, he saw that Richard Elsin had come up the remaining steps and now stood staring out at the black and the winding strips of gray. Patches of wet sand clung to his shoes and the cuffs of his pants. He had lain in fields and had brushed off the grass and the dirt... he had lain by the roadside and had rubbed at the tar stains and the sticky pebbles... he had lain in the sand and there was sand in his shoes and sand in his pockets and sand that was scratchy at his neck, and there was sand in his hair.

"You told them you lived here..." Mr. Wakeland's voice was dim.

"The arm took me away."

"And they will come for you here?"

"In the morning, not in the fog?"

Mr. Wakeland paused for a moment. He knew that he did not mean the words that he was about to speak. He knew that he did not have any faith in these words, but that he had to say them because he was only the keeper of the light... he could be only the keeper of the light... this was all he had ever known and he could not be something else now... he could not be something else to Richard Elsin... mother, father, or God. He said what he had to without looking at him.

"You could go back to your Richard Elsin, and pretend... and then you wouldn't have to go away."

Richard Elsin spun around toward the old man and stared at him as if he saw a bag of silver in the first of his hand. And then, as suddenly, he calmed. Perhaps he understood. He smiled as he thought he would smile if he were pretending. He imagined the warmth of her arm about his neck as she would tell them to go away, that he would be all right now... and her closing the door on them, and her arm about his neck. He would pretend to smile, he would pretend that in the morning the arm would free him to go down to the water and to run on the hard sand... and he would run more nimbly than ever, and his legs would get round and firm again... and he would dash across the beach sidestepping the hard little muscles and broken glass and leap over the rotted stumps and the other drift. He could always pretend that the arm was not there... there isn't an arm really... no arm.

"And maybe I can come out here sometimes."

"Yes."

Mr. Wakeland let him get halfway down the concrete steps before he called.

"The tides come in three hours, you can't make it now."

Richard Elsin looked back for a moment at the old man standing tensed at the top of the stairs, the keeper of the light.

"No, I can't make it now..."

Mr. Wakeland heard the heels clack finally on the bottom step, and the echo, and then everything was obliterated by the blaring sound of the horn.

a study of e. e. cummings' methds of presentation

BY WILLIAM GOLDHURST

Time magazine recently carried a profile on E. E. Cummings in which he was referred to as "probably America's most respected lyric poet." Whether or not modern critics would agree is open to doubt—some have been negatively impressed by the "strangeness" of his syntax, punctuation, and typography, seriously questioning whether such devices are justified. It has been suggested that he has substituted cross-word games for poetic intensity in an attempt to compensate for an obvious lack of talent. That this is true in some of his poems I will not attempt to deny—there is sufficient grounds for expressing regret at the squandering, at times, of an authentic lyric gift on what amounts to no more than irrelevant, if not "arty" devices.

A poet should, however, be judged and evaluated in terms of his best performance. I should like, therefore, to examine some of Cummings' more notable achievements, for which purpose I have selected three of the better lyrics.

They all strangely present the same exegetical difficulties, which, when clarified, might explain the impression one receives of an immediate appeal inherent in the verse. Let me begin with sonnet number 35: "goodbye Betty, don't remember me pounding on your eyes dear and have a good time with the tall tight boys at Tabari's, keep your teeth snowy, stick to beer and lime, wear dark, and where your meetings breasts are round, have roses, darling, it's all I ask of you but that when light fails and this sweet profound Paris moves with lovers, two and two bound for themselves, when passionately dusk brings softly down the perfume of the world (and just as smaller stars begin to husk heaven) you, you exactly paled and curied with mystic lips take twilight where I know: proving to Death that Love is so and so." The poem presents a dramatic situation in which the poet is saying goodbye to his sweetheart, telling her to forget him and enjoy herself with the "tall tight boys" at a bar which is probably familiar to both of them. His imperatives take the casual form of advising her to maintain her appearance, and to exercise some restraint in her drinking. Line 8, however, begins with a change of tone; in this section, I think, are the best lines of the poem. We might paraphrase it in prose thus: when evening comes, and the Parisian lovers begin to fill the streets, drink the twilight with your "mystic lips," "where I know" (i.e., he has witnessed this experience before), and, by so doing, demonstrate to death that love exists. This is perhaps all that Betty can do, and all that the poet wants her to do; to prove to death (which would deny love) that love exists, through happiness or sublimity, or life-producing—this might or might not be the case; but proving, specifically, that this psychological immediately present themselves—first, the lack of a "basis of verisimilitude" in two of the major tropes (the stars can begin to husk heaven) and (with mystic lips take twilight where I know), and second, the lack of the objective correlatives in the last line. To husk is to remove the external covering of certain fruits or seeds, especially, of an ear of corn. If the "husking" refers to the process of the stars' removing night's cover of darkness, it is inaccurate. The sun, rising, might perform this action, but the relative degree of darkness increases from daylight to night—the sky darkens. There is no period, within my experience, between twilight and midnight during which the sky undergoes a gradual lightening, except when the rising moon is the agent. Why didn't the poet use "moon?" I can answer this only by saying that I am concerned, not with what the poet didn't use, but with what he did use. Why did he use the word "husk?" Perhaps he needed a rhyme for "dusk" in line eight, and he chose a girl imbibing the twilight as his "disciple" (i.e., he chose an 'unconscious' idea)."

The objection, I believe, can be answered by considering the poet's method of presentation. The poet's love for the girl is not composed of facts which can be objectively recorded—it is an experience that cannot be accurately defined in terms of concrete objects—the poet may find that a quantity of his love for the girl consists in his admiration of her shape; but because it is a quality inherent in these lips which he cannot objectively—just as he cannot objectively the experience of the colors of one's eyes—he only communicate his impressions of that experience, he can only say that "passionately dusk brings softly down the perfume of the world," concepts which we cannot visualize nor experience sensuously, yet which we can vaguely understand. And that is all the poet asks—that we do not seek to find a correspondence in the world of fact to "passionate dusk" or perfume of the world, or the experience of imbibing the twilight. We are not asked to formulate a sharp focus on the comparisions made, as in John Donne:

"If they be two, they are two so As stiffe twin compasses are two: Here, our sensory experience of a compass is in juxtaposition to our experience of the lover's re
But this is seventeenth-century art that is the reconciliation, in the imagination, of objects apparently dissimilar. Cummings does not employ this mode of communicating his emotion—he asks us to accept hiscapacity to communicate the experience except in terms of his impression of its totality. Thus, that indefinable quality which cannot be apprehended sensuously or objectively in his verse, by virtue of the fact that those mystical elements cannot be conveyed in terms of clearly defined conceptions, love's existence is confirmed in his imagination, and it is this impression which he records.

I should like to consider number 43 in which the poet foresees the possibility of a future separation from his lady:

"It may not always be so; and I say that if your lips, which I have loved, touch another's, and your dear strong fingers clench his heart, as mine in time not far away, on another's face your sweet hair lay in such a silence as I know, or such great writhing words, as uttering, stand helplessly before the spirit at bay;"

If this should be, I say if this should be—

"joy of my heart, send me a little word;
that I may go unto him, and take his hands, saying, Accept all happiness from me."

Then shall I turn my face, and bear one bird singing terribly afar in the lost lands.

A striking image occurs in the two closing lines of the octave—"such great writhing words as uttering, stand helplessly before the spirit at bay!": I assume two possibilities: first, that the spirit is at bay before the overwhelming significance of the words, and second, that the words are at bay before the power of the spirit to apprehend the words' significance in totality. The latter would seem more likely—"at bay" is an expression we associate with a hunted animal, having been cornered by his pursuers. The "helplessly" would modify the hunted rather than the pursuer. Such a statement points directly to a definition of Cummings' verse as an attempt to apprehend the words in terms of sensuous associations, but they, "uttering overmuch," admit any kind of pinpointed focus. They utter overmuch in so far as I can never imaginatively experience the "set of objects, situation, or chain of events" which they denote. Nevertheless, they communicate directly with me; let me turn now to a consideration of the last poem, number 189, a kind of piece de resistance:

"If I have made, my lady, intricate imperfect, various things chiefly which wrong your eyes (trailer than most deep dreams are frail), songs less firm than your body's whitest song

upon my mind—if I have failed to the glance too shy—if through my singing alps

the very skulful strangeness of your

the keen primeval silence of your hair

—let the world say "his most wise nothing from death"—

you only will create (who are so perfectly alive)

your shame

lady through whose profound and fragile lips

the sweet small clumsy feet of

April came into the ragged meadow of my soul.

Here, again, we encounter the same difficulty, especially at the conclusion. Whereas in number 43 I can understand the reference to some extent, i.e., the lover, having lost his lady, will find communications with the "one bird/ singing(ing) terribly afar in the lost lands"—a symbol heark for utter demalation which corresponds to the demalation he will find in his own spirit, in 189 I must attempt to understand the "feet of April" can come through the lady's lips.

Let me try to set down my understanding of what has gone before in the sonnet. The poet is addressing his sweetheart, telling her that if he has failed, in his verses, to communicate her beauty, or, better, the precise image of her beauty, or, to be more precise, the image of her beauty, or, to be more precise, the image of her beauty in his mind, i.e., the impression of the totality of the lady—if he has failed to convey, in his poetry, the indefinable essence of her (as he conceives it), then, he continues, "let the world say 'all wise and music stole nothing from death'"—to paraphrase this statement, "it is irrelevant to me if people find nothing deathless in my poetry;" and, to go on, "you only will create (who are so perfectly alive) my shame." He is reminded of the inadequacies of his verse only by the lady whose beauty has stolen something from death; he feels in other words, that his obligation to his readers has been fulfilled by his attempt to communicate her beauty in the only terms he knows, only to the original object itself does he feel that he has failed to pay his debt—for her beauty cannot be communicated in terms which we can understand concretely; he can not denote it, only connote it. This, in painting, is called expressionism.

It practices the representation, not of the original object, but of the emotions evoked in the artist by the object. Thus, clarity is sacrificed to certain explicit modes of representation which concern themselves less with realistic portrayal than with the communication of the essence. Formal elements are dispensed with; we do not seek to find line in Rouault's painting which corresponds, in any definite way, to the real object. Nor need we demand a basis of versimilitude in Cummings' lyrics. The important thing is that he communicates directly with us. The "great writhing words, uttering overmuch," reach us by providing us a glimpse into the poet's imaginative conception of the object; we discover no crisp parallels in his tropes, only expressions which approximate probability in their fusion. This is not poetry to be dissected and analyzed microscopically. We realize, after we read enough of it, that the demands we have upon us is not a sharp focus on the comparison, but for an apprehension of the mystery of the totality of the object portrayed.

Thus a connection is made through associations of our sensory experience, expressions like: "the keen primeval silence of your hair," "the coming of my love emits a wonderful smell in my mind," the "mudworld;" etc., we will miss, if not deny, the general intent of the expression.

The danger, of course, involved in defending this mode of communication rests in its possible application to justify any and all bad metaphors. I can only point out that Cummings utilizes the method consistently in his better poetry, and that his poetry is the better for it—it succeeds in terms of our aesthetic response to it.

There are many of us, I am certain, who, in:

"lady through whose profound and fragile lips

the sweet small clumsy feet of

April came into the ragged meadow of my soul." will hardly discover the sentiment we wished to express but could not find the words.

ST. JOAN: in Defense of Burning

by Robert Mezey

I

G. B. Shaw called Saint Joan "a chronic, play in six scenes and an epilogue," and the student of drama (I do not mean necessarily the student by vocation) would do well to mark the word "chronicle." The actual facts of St. Joan's life and career afford so intense and wide a drama that in considering the records of it, or a dramatic poem dealing with it, the vicious spectator inclines to partisanship. I should imagine that a seminarian for whom the Church is the be-all and the end-all is likely to feel that it is comedy, and a young collegian, daringly atheist or aspiringly agnostic, is likely to insist that Joan got a raw deal and the church that burned her (as well as the descendant of that church) is a diabolical and corrupt power. I have no complaint against the fashionable prejudices of either the debunkers or the devout, but let us call a history a history.

Now no piece of art can be purely historical; history is not one of the arts.

Immediately these partisans, the collegian and the seminarian, will leap up and cry, Ah well, which of us is right? The answer is: neither. If a label be demanded, we should I think, call Saint Joan a 'tragic history;' but like most labels, it does not name the thing or solve the problem.

It should be explained here to anyone who thinks that the Catholic Church Militant is the villain of the play that Shaw has gone to great pains, both in the Preface and the text, to demonstrate the sincerity and integrity and justice of the court that sent Joan to the fire. (This is only in a manner of speaking; it was the sullen and vanguard English who executed her as they would execute any captured enemy general.) It can be easily proved that few heretics ever got so fair and patient a trial. And Joan was a heretic.

Certainly she was an honest girl. Certainly she was pious and chaste and humble, and a combatant genius whose coups broke England's power in France. But her honesty was insulating, her piety unorthodox, her chastity irregular, her humility proud, and her internecine and victorious battles bitterly humiliating to her foes. Moreover, she was one of the first great protestants and an exponent of Catholicism's most dangerous enemy, nationalism. And though today we abhor the excesses and brutalities of the Holy Inquisition, we must realize the necessity of the office. In one of the great speeches of the play, Shaw's Inquisitor says, "Heresy at first seems innocent and even laudable; but it ends in such a monstrous horror of unnatural wickedness that the most tender-hearted among you, if you saw it at work as I have seen it, would clamor against the mercy of the Church in dealing with it..."

remember also that no court of law can be so cruel as the common people are to those whom they suspect of heresy. The heretic in the hands of the Holy Office is safe from violence, is assured of a fair trial, and cannot suffer death, even when guilty, if repentance follows afterwards.

As a matter of fact, the proceedings in 1456 which rehabilitated Joan and declared her judges to be corrupt and fraudulent were themselves lies and slanders. In the epilogue of Saint Joan, Ladven announces to the Dauphin: "At this inquiry from which I have just come, there was shameless perjury, courtly corruption, calumny of the dead who did their duty according to their lights, cowardly evasion of the issue, testimony made of idle tales that could not impose on a ploughboy." This inquiry was the pro-Joan hearing of 1456.

II

In seeking a rich and definitive understanding of Saint Joan, we must turn to the epilogue. I have heard it said by various people of generally good taste and excellent judgement that the epilogue spoils the play and would have been better omitted. This is not true at all. It is necessary to Shaw's purpose that both Joan and the Church be seen in a clear historical light, and perhaps most important, that we, the readers and the spectators, perceive fully the inevitability of Joan's end, not only in its mediavel context, but in the whole area of human life. It is implied again and again that Joan, because of her Socratical tactlessness and interference, officious in spite of its brilliant consequences, must perish. It is expedient that one woman die for ten people. Anyone, particularly a woman, who must by his genius render even dimmer the faint enough light of lesser minds or battle by battle by his action and powers and institutions whose very existences depend on acceptance and obedience (e.g., feudalism and nationalism) is doomed to the consequences of the frustration and rage he evokes. Shaw, in his Preface, compares Joan to Socrates, and considers this phenomenon the fatal disadvantages of wit more perceptively than I can:

Now it is always hard for superior wits to understand the fury roused by their exposures of the stupidities of comparative dullards. Even Socrates, for all his age and experience, did not defend himself at his trial like a man who understood the long accumulated fury that had burst on him, and was clamoring for his death. His accusers, if born 2500 years later, might have been picked out of any first-class carriage on a suburban railway during the evening.
morning rush from or to the city; for he had really nothing to say except that he and his like could not endure being shown up as idiots every timeRobert opened his mouth.

III

I intend now to embark on a most serious venture, which, if it appears to you as little more than absurd, has nothing to recommend it but originality. Nonetheless, I think it is worth trying, for it is important to me that you see the epilogue for what it really is: a crescendo, tightening, condensing, and organic. This venture, of which I speak is a possible, slightly forced, interpretation of Saint Joan minus epilogue.

The Catholic Church is, as Shaw depicts it in the calculated utterances of Cauchon and the Inquisitor, an enormous, resourceful, and profound force. It is shrewd, it is honest, it possesses the great heroic qualities. But in the case of Joan of Arc is laid bare its one heroic flaw. It is wrong. If in some way the Church had found a way to demolish the catastrophic power of the Maid, a way to subvert this new spirit of which she was the living symbol, as merciful, cunning, and just, it would have known a success as dazzling as its error was lethal. But it could not. It did not. And the most pathetic detail of the picture is the inexorable course the Church ran to its own destruction. If it had been twice as cunning and twice as colossal, it could not have stamped out the fire that crept from Joan's stake to set ablaze all of Christendom into a holocaust that left feudalism a memory and the Church Militant a subdued and sometimes feeble thing. It is the very inevitability of Joan's triumphant doom and the ensuing scheme that enables one to see the character of Shaw's Church as grand . . . and the Church a tragic hero.

But it is not Shaw's intention that it should be so. Hence, the epilogue. Namely because no denouement is necessary, it does not fulfill the function of most final acts. Those affairs which should otherwise have been left unfinished or unsolved the audience already knows the answer to. Most of the spectators are generally aware of the concatenation of events from 1429 to 1431. But the epilogue does remind us that although the Church may capitulate and amend its inquisition by canonization, those poor creatures, men, for whose terrestrial guidance and souls' salvation the Church exists, still will not accept the ungovernmentable and single-minded genius, whom nothing guides but protest and no one saves but Time. The final speeches of the play pound home with intense dramatic force the fate of heightened sensibility in a plodding and stupid world. And as Cauchon leaves the stage, saying The heretic is always better dead. And mortal eyes cannot distinguish the saint from the heretic, and the Archbishop follows, saying The utmost I can say is that though I dare not bless you, I hope I may one day enter into the Inquisition, saying I who am of the dead, testified that day that you were innocent. But I do not see dispensed with under existing circumstances.

the Church is reduced to its fallible and somewhat stubborn imperatives, and Joan, Saint Joan, stands in ineffable radiance and glory, and most of all in loneliness the genius who fails to save as Christ failed to save.
The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems,
And spoils.

William Shakespeare

It is with a humility born of a sense of inadequacy in matters musical that I undertake to comment in this column upon Kenyon's musical tastes. There are certain glaring examples the citing of which I believe will demonstrate the limited scope which is the object of my criticism. We need look no further than to the record section of the bookshop for our first example. I do not wish to be understood as criticizing the management of the bookshop. It is obvious that the law of supply and demand is beyond the control of any person on the staff of the store. One buys only what one expects to be able to sell. This is a basic determinant of resource allocation in a free-enterprise economy. A recent shipment of records to the bookshop was composed of the following selections: Tchaikovsky's overplayed Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, Toscanini Conducts: The Moldau, Danse Macabre, and The Sorcerer's Apprentice; Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, Romeo and Juliet by Tchaikovsky, and one selection each by Sibelius and Prokofiev. Here again I feel myself in danger of being misunderstood. I enjoy these works very much and certainly would not dispute their value. I simply maintain that one should not limit his musical interest only to composers up to and including Tchaikovsky, and neglect as a consequence such important contemporary composers as Barber, Schuman, and Bloch. The nature of the records ordered by the bookshop indicates then, the limited scope of Kenyon's musical tastes.

Several weeks ago there was in evidence another indication of Kenyon's musical naivete. In the assembly which allocates money to finance the cultural pursuits of the student body, albeit in a begrudging manner, the term "modernistic" was applied disdainfully to the new records that have been purchased to augment the Carnegie Record Record Library in Pierce Hall. Admittedly the new records are largely dedicated to the more modern composers while at the same time including Mahler's song cycle, "Youth's Magic Horn," and "Rattle's Parade Ballet Suite." It is fairly obvious, notwithstanding some individuals' opinions, that this buying of records of contemporary music does not represent a personal bias on the part of the purchaser but rather a conscious effort to correct a deficiency in the library which arises from the age of the library itself. The new records include Bartok's six string quartets, and much music by Schönberg and his pupil Alban Berg, the latter records being the cause of much dissatisfaction among frequenters of the music room.

The music written by modern composers is usually ignored by the beautiful, melodious outpouring of Tchaikovsky but we must not dismiss them as valueless on such grounds. 'This neglect represents a serious effort on the part of many extremely well trained musicians to find their individual methods and techniques of musical expression. This should be sufficient justification for a claim to some attention from music lovers. When we reject works for sounding unusual to our ears we are only limiting the audiences of Beethoven's and Ravel's time. This is the manner in which works by these composers were received when first performed—works whose greatness no one disputes now.

This neglect of contemporary music cannot be excused by stating that it is all a matter of taste. This neglect due to dislike is subject to attack on the grounds that it is a result of an inadequate knowledge of music. It is possible that the listener is not capable of understanding what a composer is trying to accomplish. Such ignorance cannot hide behind the theory of relativity of good and bad. We as music lovers have a responsibility to approach all music with an open mind. We have an obligation to take an interest in music that is being written in our time. When we shirk this duty we find that a composer of the stature of Bela Bartok—"one of the most uniquely endowed and imaginative composers of today, and one of the most alive and vital forces in twentieth-century music—has never been accorded a fame commensurate with his genius and his significance."(1)

One of the factors that limited the amount of creative activity that Bartok could engage in was the poverty stricken life that was forced upon him and which led finally to his death. This poverty was in large measure due to neglect of his music by the public.

The high command of the party seemed to have abandoned the heavy emphasis upon charges of "Social¬ism." They seemed rather (with the exceptions of Bricker, Jenner, Taft, and McCarthy) to use corruption and Korea as main weapons. Thus they abandoned to that degree the ideological opposition to New Deal social policies and turned to the theme, "Throw the rascals out—we can do the same things better!" Even their former cries of "Bureaucracy" seemed to have been watered down to, "Our bureaus won't have 5 percenters and mink coats." These incidents of the abandonment of ethics in government were used to indicate corruption and inefficiency of the "ins" without necessarily refuting their principles.

For the future? I cannot help but feel that 1952 was a repetition (although certainly more dramatic and compelling) of 1946 when the situation on the consumer's market swept the Republicans to a Congressional victory in those disputed seats. The 1948 election reversed this and saw a Democratic victory again. 1952 was a psychological release bound to come when one group is in power any length of time and the immediate problems make the electorate vote for the "outs." It was a psychological release of a people who were tired of wars (while not necessarily blaming the "ins" for them), tired of the great debate over foreign responsibility (while not denying these responsibilities), tired of the often shoddy personal actions of the President who was to be their leader and inspiration. I am firmly convinced that their great desire for a change was not one of conviction for that party which they put into power nor an acceptance of its philosophy. The American people saw a man completely divorced from all former political connections and conflicts. On him (not the Republican party) they placed their hopes for a solution to their problems. Will the old political alignments take place and re-establish themselves in substantially the same manner now that the "pressure valve" has been turned on and the steam has escaped? I believe so. It may be as soon as the elections of 1954. It may be 1956.
